Hiking to Machu Picchu

Summer might be the busiest time to see Machu Picchu, but it's the most beautiful time to see blue skies, lush green grass, and awe-inspiring views. Whether you're up for the challenge of hiking the Inca Trail or would prefer the Inca Rail, it's wise to spend a few days casually sightseeing in Cusco to adjust to the altitude first. This small Peruvian town is postcard-perfect, with a hilltop that lights up at night, a bustling local market, and countless alpaca stores to splurge on a sweater for the chilly nights. If you're on the fence about scaling Huayna Picchu — the mountain in front of Machu Picchu with the killer views, opt in — trust us.

Where to Stay: Have you passed the point in your life where hostels are, um fun? If so, it's worth the splurge to stay at the J.W. Marriott Cusco, where comfy beds make restless nights thanks to altitude sickness much better. Same for Aguas Calientes — which also caters to the backpacker crowd — a stay at Sumaq will make getting up 4 a.m. more bearable.
